DOLLS CARRIED BY YOUNG WOMEN. African Mothers That Kill One of a Pair of Twins.

Dolls we associate with children and the núrsery, not with problems of civilization and national customs. But the doll has much more of a history and plays a more important part in the world than is generally suspected. In fact, dolls are so important in some countries as to lead a noted Scotchman to devote years of study Andrew Findlater, LL. D., the eminent

Scotchman of letters, has written a paper filled with almost incredible information Not only has the use of dolls been in vogue from the remotest ages, but it is common in all barbarous nations as well as Neither is it to children alone that the fendling of dolls is confined, says Dr. Find-later. Among many uncultured tribes females are known to carry dolls long after they have arrived at womanhood.

The women of the Bechuanas carry a doll with them until they give birth to a child that lives, and the Basuto women have a similar practice.

Dr. Findlater says further that in many sections of Africa twins are regarded with unspeakable terror. There is a tradition among the savages that if both children are allowed to live they must be cither mentally or physically unsound, as they would have but one spirit between them.

Accordingly, whenever twins are born, the younger is always kuled by the parents. As though in some measure to show she did not wish to be cruel to the murdered offspring, the mother takes with her a doll on bestows upon it a care equal to that of the first-born child.

"Among the Wanyamwezi," says Dr. Findlater, "it is cus'omery for the parents to kill one of the twins and then to wrap a gourd or calabash in skins, to place it to sleep in the same bed with the surviving child, and even to put food at its lips."

These dolls of the savages are for the most part cut out of plain wood, though in a few cases an elephant's tusk is utilized

Expensive dolls are for the most part made in England, while the cheaper varieties are usually made in France, the Netherlands and along the River Rhine. It is a curious fact that the eyes of Queen Victoria, which are blue, years ago set the fash-ion for English dolls.

LOVE THEIR HOME.

Their Native Heath.

With the exception, possibly, of the anthropoid apes, the homing sense is possessed in a higher or a lower degree by all mammals; this is true also of the birds. The well-known exploits of the carrier pigeon are so familiar that they will scarcely need comment. The duck and the goose sometimes have this sense very highly developed. I once knew a goose to travel back home after being carried in a covered basket for the distance of eighteen miles. A drake and a duck, to my certain knowledge, traveled back to their old home, a distance of nine miles, after being trans-ported by railway. Instances of nome-returning in dogs, cats, horses, etc., are of such common occurrence that I hardly need call attention to them. The following instance is so unique, however, that I will In the fall of 1861 a gentleman of Vin-

Shortly after his arrival the steers made their escape, swam the Onio at Owensboro', Ky., 160 miles below Louisville, and in a veek or so were found one morning at the gate of their old home at Lebanon. Led by their sixth sense alone, these animals had made a journey of several hundred miles over a route entirely unknown to them. Fishermen are well aware of the fact that certain fish choose localities for their lurking places which they will share with no other fish. The black bass, brook trout, sturgeon and goggle-eye are familiar examples of the fish which have this habit. Some time ago I performed the following experiment: I took a bass from its home near a sunken stump, and, after passing a near a sunken stump, and, after passing a thin, short piece of strong thread through the web of its tail and knotting it, replaced it in the river two miles below its lurking place. The next day I saw it in its old # place. The next day I saw it in its old home, clearly recognizable from the bit of thread which waved to and fro in the clear water as the fish moved its tail. From the Century.

Who can doubt, then, that if Lee had been provided with a reserve of 20,000 fresh cavalry, under such a leader as Forrest, at Gaines' Mill, or the second Manassas, or Chancellorsville the Army of the Potomac would not have survived to fight another battle? For, unless Sheridan be excepted, there was no cavalry general on either side in the war who could equal Forrest in the pursuit of a defeated army. Lord Wolseley has said, in his sketch of Forrest, that "Forrest's sixty-mile pur-suit of Sturgis after their bettle suit of Sturgis after their battle was a most remarkable achievement and well worth attention by military students."
